future of work
The very nature of work is changing. Anything that we currently do that is structured, repeatable or predictable WILL be automated.

49% of the activities that people are paid to do in the global economy have the potential to be automated. (McKinsey 2017)
Our future lies in ‘new work’ where our innately human skills are most valuable:
With the world of work changing and the workforce of the future becoming more agile, companies are needing a human solution for redeploying within and transitioning people out of organisations...

IN SUMMARY

- The future of work will challenge humans in new ways
- We will need to manage our own careers, remain relevant, and stay up to date
- People are more disconnected than ever, in an ‘always on’ world
- We are witnessing anxiety about the future, isolation, and less meaningful human interaction
IN SUMMARY

- Large scale redundancies will increase mental health issues, in addition to overwhelm and burnout
- People do not just need a job; they need a human safety net
- We all require a place to belong, connection and collaboration
- Let’s enter the conscious decade and work on sustaining both humans and nature!
